Some philosophers seem to find it helpful to describe life in terms of being and becoming. Very likely, the second phase of the process as thus described will remain more permanently in the memories of those who will be taking their Bachelor of Laws degree from the School in June of 1959 than is quite usual.

In their time of residence at the School, this class has seen a good deal of change and, we hope, improvement in the physical resources available for enabling the successful study of law. The class has shared some of the disappointments attendant upon failure to secure some much needed new housing for the School, but this it has done in good part. As it is graduated, the class can share the satisfaction of having become a part of a thrust designed to provide a ninety-acre university campus in Newark, which can be a suitable setting for a modern graduate professional school such as the University's School of Law.

Withal, the more important intellectual life of the School has continued, to say the least, unabated. Opportunities have been afforded the individual members of the class to transcend themselves in preparing for the learned profession of the law. The extent of success in this respect can genuinely be appraised only as the future decades, for which the opportunities in the School have been designed, arrive.
